

Membership in Paleocultural Research Group

Paleocultural Research Group (PCRG) conducts scientific research, trains students, and educates the public on the archaeology and paleoecology of the Great Plains and Southern Rocky Mountains. PCRG's public archaeology projects use state-of-the-art field and lab techniques to study human communities and their relationships to the natural environment, from North America's earliest American Indian inhabitants to nineteenth-century traders and settlers. PCRG broadly disseminates its research findings to professional and public audiences, promoting a better understanding of the region's past and fostering preservation of its the unmatched archaeological resources.

PCRG membership is open to the public. Two membership categories are available:

Participating Members include students, professional scientists, and other interested individuals who carry out specific research and educational activities, working in flexible combinations as required for specific projects. Families with two or more participating members can save money with a Household Participating Membership.

Supporting Members include people who support the goals and activities of the organization and who wish to be informed about current activities of the organization, but who are not able to participate directly in the activities of the group.

All Participating and Supporting Members receive an annual report summarizing recent and ongoing PCRG projects and discounts on selected PCRG publications. Participating Members receive additional communications concerning projects under development, opportunities for participation, and priority on project volunteer applications.
